A LESSON FOR SALLY

"AND do you know what else I think?" Sally's voice rose to an angry squeak. "I think Elmer has an ulterior motive in going out to the golf course every single day!"

"Oh, Sally," Barbara scoffed, "what kind of an ulterior motive could Elmer have? You know better than I do that golf means more to him than almost anything else."

"I know," Sally returned dimly. "Sometimes I think it means more to him than I do." Barbara was about to inject an encouraging note, but Sally silenced her with a wave of her hand. "Anyhow," she went on, "that isn't what I'm worried about now." She looked darkly around even though the two girls were sitting on Sally's front porch and no one else was in hearing distance. "It's Elaine," she whispered.

"Elaine?" Barbara asked surprised.

"Yes, Elaine," Sally moaned. "I don't know why she wants Elmer—not that he isn't nice looking enough and lots of fun when he isn't playing golf," she put in defensively, "but I'm convinced she does. Maybe she's bored with all her other dates, maybe she just wants to learn how to play golf—I don't know. Anyhow, there it is!"

"But, Sally, how do you know?" Barbara asked, still incredulous. Elaine was one of the most popular girls in Barrett High School, and Elmer had never attracted any attention from her before.

"I biked out to the golf links last night just before supper," Sally explained. "I thought Elmer and I could ride home together, but when I got there, I saw Elmer and Elaine walking back to the club house together. She was looking up at him worshipfully, and Elmer was carrying both their golf bags. And even from where I was, I could see that he was enjoying every minute of it."

"Oh," Barbara gasped, "that's terrible!"

Sally nodded. She'd been dating Elmer for so long that he was almost second nature to her, and now this! "What am I going to do?" she groaned. "Of all people to have to compete with—Elaine! She's so pretty!"

Barbara looked critically at her friend. "Well, you aren't exactly a monster yourself," she said.

"Thanks, chum," Sally smiled gratefully. "But even after several hours of playing golf, Elaine comes off the course looking as if she'd just stepped out of a beauty parlor! I can imagine how I'd look!" Sally shuddered at the thought.

"That's it!" Barbara brightened. "That's it!"

"What's what?" Sally was puzzled.

"What you have to do," Barbara replied. "Why don't you ever play golf with Elmer?"

"Because I don't play golf," Sally said. "You know that."

"I know," Barbara went on excitedly, "but does Elmer know it?"

"Well," Sally thought back, "when we first began going out together, I told him I wasn't the athletic type, and since then he's never suggested playing golf or tennis or anything like that. He just tells me about all his exploits, I pat him on the back, and that's that."

"He's probably forgotten you ever told him that," Barbara said enthusiastically. "Don't you see? If you show an interest in golf, he'll have to take you out to the course. And then he won't have time to teach Elaine any more. And maybe golf will come easy to you so that he'll really be impressed."

"Why not?" Sally agreed. "That's wonderful, Barbara! After all, it can't be too hard to hit a ball with a stick!"

When Elmer arrived at Sally's house that evening, Sally peered sharply at him, but he definitely did not look guilty about his extra-curricular activities at the golf links. At first, Sally was annoyed. Then another thought occurred to her. Maybe he didn't even realize what Elaine was trying to do; perhaps he just thought he was helping her out. All the better, Sally decided. He'd be less likely to think anything strange was going on.

The evening passed by as their home dates usually did. They listened to a few records, danced a little, looked at the new snapshots in Sally's album, and finally went into the kitchen where Sally made hamburgers for them and took sodas out of the refrigerator. She'd made a point all evening of being especially interested in Elmer's golfing progress and the news of various experts, and she decided now was the time to bring the conversation to a head.

"Elmer," she said coyly after he'd demolished one hamburger and had begun a second, "do you know you've never taken me out to the course?"

Startled, Elmer gulped down a bite of hamburger. "I didn't think you were interested in playing golf," he protested.

"Why, of course I am," Sally sounded properly surprised. "I've never been too interested in most athletics," she explained, "but how could I help being interested in something that takes up so much of your time?" Elmer seemed a little uneasy at that remark, so Sally lowered her eyelids and said softly, "You know, Elmer, I'd love to learn how to play."

"You would?" Elmer queried, still sounding rather too surprised for Sally's comfort.

"Yes," Sally said firmly, "I would. How about tomorrow?"

"Well," Elmer said somewhat uncertainly, "I guess tomorrow's okay. I'll pick you up at one."

The next day Sally dressed very carefully, checking and re-checking every point of her costume and make-up to make sure that nothing could go wrong. She had a mental image of how Elaine would look if she were at the course today, and she didn't want to take any chances on looking like a drowned rat beside her. She wore a trim sweater and tailored skirt, white socks and neat saddle shoes; her lipstick and powder had been applied very painstakingly; and she'd tied her hair back with a ribbon.

Elmer arrived on time, and the two of them biked out to the golf links. The instant they arrived Sally saw Elaine, looking exquisite as usual. Immediately Elaine caught Elmer's eye and waved gaily, and Elmer nodded enthusiastically back. Sally smiled half-heartedly. The next thing she knew Elaine had sauntered over to them.

"I'm all alone today," she smiled bewitchingly at Elmer. "Would you mind if I joined you?"

Sally was about to mutter something about a private lesson, but Elmer spoke first.

"Why not?" he grinned happily. "Two pupils are better than one!" Elaine laughed appreciatively, but Sally just glared at him.

From the first time the three of them teed off, Sally began to think that the whole idea was a flop. What was the good of her going to all this trouble if Elaine came along with them anyhow? But she wasn't going to give up that easily. Maybe she could still impress Elmer with her golfing ability.

Elmer teed off first, cautioning them both to watch carefully. Elaine's turn came next. Sally watched her scornfully.

It took her several tries to hit the ball at all, and then it went only a few feet. She smiled helplessly, and Elmer apologized for her and told her not worry, that it took lots of practice.

"Okay, Sally," Elmer said. "Now remember to keep your eyes on the ball and to follow through on your swing."

Sally looked down at the ball. All she could see was Elaine's smiling face. She swung furiously at the ball, missing. She swung again. She missed again. After about ten tries she bent down, picked up the ball, and threw it down the fairway.

"There's no sense in my holding us up," she told Elmer, and marched grimly forward.

By the time they'd finished eight holes, Sally was ready to throw in the towel. She could hit the ball occasionally now, but she couldn't do much more. Elaine wasn't any better, but at least she pretended to be extremely interested in learning. She was still smiling, and she looked as she did when she'd arrived at the course, Sally's hair had come undone from her ribbon; her skirt was twisted out of shape; and her saddle shoes had been covered with mud ever since she'd had to hunt for her ball in the swampy ground near the pond, five holes ago. And she wasn't smiling.

If she had to go through all this to keep Elmer, Elaine could have him. Who'd said that it was easy to hit a ball with a stick? As far as Sally was concerned, it was one of the most impossible things in the world.

Enraged at everything in general, she swung at the ball on the ninth tee. She didn't keep her eye on the ball; she didn't know whether she followed through on her swing; she just didn't care.

"I think it went up on the green," Elmer shouted, and began to run in the general direction of the ball. Elaine and Sally followed him.

When they reached him, Elmer was standing by the hole, his mouth open in admiration. "Sally!" he exclaimed. "A hole in one!" Elaine looked incredulously at Sally and peered into the hole for herself.

"You're a wonderful pupil, Sally," Elmer was saying. "You really catch on fast."

At last Sally smiled. Maybe all this trouble had been worth something after all. "Then," she looked at Elmer coquettishly, "don't you think I'm entitled to private lessons?"

Elmer nodded, still amazed at what she'd done. Only then did they turn to see what Elaine's reaction was, but Elaine was already on her way back to the club house—alone. Neither Elmer nor Sally missed her!
